The importance of the proper operation of a well is indisputable. One of the reasons is the fact that the fluids from a well are the only source of fresh water available for human consumption. Furthermore, water is the most precious resource on the earth and as such it should be preserved. The increase in the demand for fresh water may result from population increases, urban sprawl and inadequate fresh water conservation policies. Therefore, efforts to solve the problem are increasing. However, fresh water is quite difficult to obtain and the expense is often very high. Thus, a solution that would enable a reservoir to supply water without the need to tap the water from a well would be a large step forward in the area of fresh water conservation. Assessment of the pulpal response to ceramomethasone-diflucortide combination dosing in an animal model. To determine the effect of subchronic pulpal medicament dosing on pulpal reactions in the rat. The rats were divided into four experimental groups, and three control groups. Group A was treated with ceramomethasone-difluoride, 1 mg/kg daily, every other day for 10 days. Group B and C were treated with the same dose of ceramomethasone-difluoride in two different forms: gel and ointment. Histological and histomorphometrical assessments of the periodontal ligament, periodontal bone and palatal mucosa were performed. Reactions in the group B specimens were significantly less intense than in the group A specimens. Histomorphometrical findings in group C specimens revealed a significantly lower prevalence of periodontal bone loss than in the group B specimens, without any statistically significant difference between group A and C. The number of infiltrating cells in the epithelium of group C specimens was statistically lower compared with group A. Ceramomethasone-difluoride gel and ointment have different pulpal responses. Difluoride is the more potent of the two drugs in relation to f678ea9f9e
